INSPIRATION a paper dance

Frozen Moment: When paper dances

A book is often thought of as a solid object. You carry your school books in your bag and they add weight. Some books can be pretty thick, others thin, but when bound tight, it's a singular thing.

A book is made of pages however, sometimes thousands. Each page unique, holding its own sequence of lettering, and each page is a light feather to the bird that is a book.

These pages, like all physical things, are met with forces: the tension and compression of its binding, the force of gravity, the friction and pressure of wind. And when exposed to enough of these forces, the pages flip themselves from cover to cover, picking up momentum.

At first glance, the frantic flying of pages in the wind looks random, chaotic, almost aggressive or panicked.

Slow it down, and this motion is a dance. And like any dance, it's a sum of actions and reactions, to's and fro's, a series of rests and rises, and a free movement that is never the same but always containing a rhythm. When I look at pages moving, as if by their own inclination, I hear music through their rises and rests, and the pages become a group of dancers all moving to one song or a symphony of instruments, all different tones and octaves that work with one another to become a beautiful composition.

This moment is when paper dances:

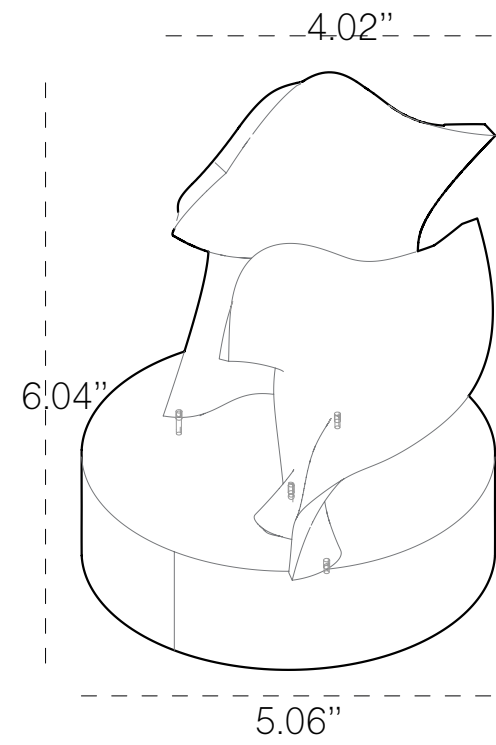

1. its rhythmic
2. its free
3. Its several parts of a whole, forces that are working together, breaking a book up from its seemingly singular unit into a performance of individual pieces.
